Contemporary Justice Review
Special Issue on Teaching Restorative Justice

As Restorative Justice continues to mature, issues about what it is, what it is not, what it should be, and what it should not be continue to be explored along with discussions about the vehicle to best deliver its message. The literature continues to grow along with the various practices that evolve in its name. Given this perspective, Contemporary Justice Review (CJR) seeks essays that focus on the teaching of restorative justice. Those who teach classes, or even sections of a class, on restorative justice are encouraged to share their pedagogy.

Contemporary Justice Review invites submissions for a special issue about the teaching of restorative justice, guest edited by Jo-Ann Della Giustina. Restorative justice is taught within various disciplines, including but not limited to peace studies, justice studies, religious studies, philosophy, criminal justice, and education. The breadth of academic disciplines along with the diversity of restorative justice itself highlights the gamut of potential inclusions.

Contemporary Justice Review prefers articles written in engaging and accessible prose which avoids academic jargon and that offers insights in how to foster justice throughout daily life. Examples of submissions topics include: pedagogical ideologies, teaching restorative justice in interdisciplinary programs, teaching restorative justice to criminal justice students, classroom methodologies that encourage restorative justice, etc.

Contemporary Justice Review is an interdisciplinary journal for scholars, activists, and practitioners of social and restorative justice around the globe who seek to design and implement models of justice that take into account the needs of all.
